

Should ICTR Begin Phase Two Of Its Work?

In the past, whenever one spoke about the crimes committed by RPF, Kagame's servants will yell, "where's the evidence?" Today the US Statement has declassified and published most of the evidence on its website. Our friend Scott Bihl has also been posting those documents on a Facebook group called Friends of Reason. Please take a look for yourself and just notice how they have become like a cold shower on RPF usual yellers: they don't dare to make a comment anymore; the documents say it all and there's nothing for them to argue about.

Now that we have plenty of evidence coming from a world's superpower and a close confident of RPF during the period crimes were committed - what should be the next step? To indict RPF criminals correct?

ICTR should be allowed to begin phase two of its work. It will be the same ICTR with its original mandate but with proper enforcement this time. This is the only way to ensure that only the bad guys are pulled out of RDF (Rwanda Defense Forces) and indicted accordingly. Finally, it is the only way to ensure proper justice for all Rwandans. There no reason why ICTR should close its doors while it has only prosecuted one of the two sides it was entrusted to prosecute. That is, ICTR has tackled only 50% of its ORIGINAL task so far.

With recent developments, there's no doubt that public opinion is changing around the world about the way they viewed RPF in the past. Nonetheless, the US and other countries need to back their words with actions. Paul Kagame has taken the lives of millions of innocent populations in the African great lakes region, and it's about time he gets held accountable for his crimes.
